NEW TECHNIQUE IN REVIVING DROWNED PROPOSED AT U. C.

George Hughling, associate in physical education at the University of California, has just suggested an improvement on commonly accepted rescue and revival procedures which he believes will increase the recovery chances of a drowned person.

Essentially this improved technique relates to the time of starting resuscitation. Instead of waiting until the rescued person is brought to shore, Hughling is of the opinion that resuscitation should be started as soon as the rescuer reaches the drowning person if breathing has stopped. He points out that the seconds or minutes expended in towing a body to shore and carrying it out of the water are frequently fatal to hopes of resuscitation.

This early resuscitation can be carried on while swimming by use of the cross chest carry and the application of rhythmic pressure against the drowned person's lower ribs. On reaching shallow water the restoration of breathing can be further hastened by continuing the rhythmic pressure in the saddleback and firemen's lift advocated by the American Red Cross.

On three occasions, Hughling says, he was able to restore breathing in drowned persons by this method before he got them out of the water. On one of these occasions quick revival made it possible for him to go out again immediately to search for the body of a second person. In all cases it offers a means of utilizing the valuable time which is otherwise wasted between reaching the drowning person and placing him in position for resuscitation on shore.
